"It's hard not to instantly fall for a band with a name like What Would Jesus Drive." – Bearded Magazine

What Would Jesus Drive are husband and wife Tim Box (vocals and guitar) and Amy Casey (vocals and guitar), joined by Gemma Horgan (decks and air synth) and John Newman (keyboards, samples). It was only a matter of time before decided to tear the scene apart with a feature length release, and here they are with their debut album Black and Blue.

Their previous releases, EP Fragile Mansions, single Your Awful Kids, and their respective videos, caused quite a stir, seeing them featured on websites such as Subba-Cultcha, Artrocker and Clash. The band have also played alongside Dirty Pretty Things and The Drums, as well as being one of the favourites on the Introducing stage at Radio One's Big Weekend in 2010.

"...Great, great stuff!" – Subba-Cultcha.com

Black and Blue opens with a shriek of sirens, which sets the tone for what's to come. The album is a spectacular punch in the face, each track driven by raw guitars layered by synthesizers; sneering vocals and a cacophony of drums that make you want to trash your living room just to join in. It's a powerful return to the roots of post-punk, with enough musical innovation to create a sound that's very much lodged in the present. Like all the best punk records, What Would Jesus Drive complement their powerful backline with politically charged lyrics, creating landscapes of urban ennui, the tribulations of poverty and the gradual deterioration of modern society. It's an outstanding debut album from a band that has already proved their potential with their previous releases.
